

Madison
Mrs. Gibson
AAVTC-6
7 December 2015

Shadow Phoenix (Phoenix)

Umbra phoenix

These fearsome creatures are the night, coming out. Their claws and wings make the most fear. Using from the shadows to move around the night, the name Shadow started. Phoenix came around from the ideas to make from the wings and tails. Their acrobatics and ability to be ridden make them intriguing to be around.

These bird-horse are honored and feared from the people of England and North America, often made out to be hiding and waiting for something. First reports coming from the 13th century, these bird-like creatures coming from a small part of England then spreading have been around. Not seen or heard from in many centuries make many biologists wonder where they were.

In summer, the light of the fading sun there where their tails are often seen. As the sun disappears behind the horizon, their distinct call can be heard. During the rest of the year, their flight is often hidden.